CC Angela Rayner, Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Housing, Communities and Local Government

Dear Chancellor of the Exchequer,

We're writing to you as members and affiliates of Homeless Link, who are a collection of the country's leading homelessness and housing organisations, to raise the alarm regarding the perilous funding cliff-edge homelessness services across the country are currently facing. We ask that you safeguard the sector in the Autumn Budget and commit to review spending on homelessness as part of the upcoming Spending Review.

Perilous funding cliff-edge

Everyone needs a safe, secure place to live. But rough sleeping rose by 27% in 2023 and 60% since 2021. If it keeps rising at the current rate, numbers in 2024 will be similar to the 2017 peak. Meanwhile over 150,000 children are currently trapped living in temporary accommodation, often in very poor conditions. Behind these statistics are people, let down by systems that should protect them, the insecurity and trauma of homelessness holding them back from achieving their potential.

Homelessness charities work in communities across the country, providing accommodation and expert, holistic support to people who often live with severe and overlapping support needs such as mental ill-health, substance misuse and contact with the justice system. From outreach teams engaging people sleeping rough to specialised supported accommodation, homelessness services play a critical role in supporting people to manage their wellbeing, engage with wider health and social care provisions, access training and employment opportunities, and ultimately to live independent, fulfilled lives.

In recognition of the support provided and the overwhelming need across the homelessness system, through the 2021 Spending Review government has provided dedicated grant funds to deliver homelessness and rough sleeping support services. However, the current Spending Review period is now coming to an end and the vast majority of funding commitments made to relieve homelessness, including many of those for people experiencing street homelessness, are set to expire by April 2025.

Nationally, the funding set to end between now and April 2025 includes, but is not limited to:

- £548million Rough Sleeping Initiative (RSI) funding
- £435million Rough Sleeping Accommodation Programme (RSAP) funding
- £13million Night Shelter Transformation Fund (NSTF) funding
- £7million Voluntary and Community Frontline Sector (VCFS) funding
- £8.55m Op FORTITUDE funding

It equates to almost £1bn due to leave the homelessness sector by the end of the financial year. Without an extension, this would represent the most significant setback in progress towards ending homelessness and rough sleeping in recent history.

The inherent risks are severe, and they are already beginning to take effect. They include:

- All forms of homelessness increasing;
- Bed spaces being lost as services avoidably return rental contracts to landlords;
- Loss of skilled staff on a large scale, with a recent survey from St Martin-in-the-Fields finding 64% of frontline workers feel their role has a negative impact on their wellbeing, while only 47% of frontline workers reported feeling secure in their jobs.
- People with severe and multiple disadvantage facing eviction from supported accommodation, triggering local authority statutory duties for some and pushing others into rough sleeping;
- Loss of established local partnerships, institutional knowledge and best practice;
- Trusted providers exiting the market;
- Huge extra strain placed on health and emergency services.

At the same time service contracts across the homelessness sector have fallen well behind the cost of delivering services. Most existing contracts were set in April 2022, before the cost of living crisis saw rapid inflation to the cost of service delivery. Even prior to this, government spending on homelessness sat well below the cost incurred by services, and inflation merely exacerbated the systemic underfunding that had already pushed providers out of the market.

With all forms of homelessness rising rapidly, support services are needed now more than ever. As bed spaces constrict, providers across the country are already turning people away. We cannot afford to lose more beds because services cannot afford to stay open. Insights from the sector show that 64% of providers manage contracts that are no longer deemed financially viable.

That's why we're asking the Treasury to give the homelessness sector certainty in the upcoming Autumn Budget through a one-year rollover of existing homelessness funding into 2025/26. This should include an inflationary uplift to local authority commissioned contracts for homelessness services.

A new ring-fenced funding system

While the sector must be given security in the short-term, there are deep flaws with the current system of homelessness funding. Current spending is inefficient and extremely complex, comprising a patchwork of different funding schemes. A recent report from the National Audit Office attempted to quantify spending on homelessness across government and in doing so showcased the complexity of current funding arrangements. The analysis found that funding was 'fragmented and generally short-term, inhibiting homelessness prevention work'.

NAO's report found £2.44bn was spent on homelessness services, echoing the previous government's announced headline spend set out in the 'Ending Rough Sleeping for Good' strategy but this is exclusive of the unknown figure also spent on non-statutory exempt accommodation services which make a significant majority of the homelessness supported accommodation sector, - which estimates put at around £1.9 billion of additional funding based on 2016 spending levels - meaning the total figure spent on homelessness is significantly higher.

The challenges are rooted across the system. The cost of delivering temporary accommodation has left local authorities with little choice but to pull resources inward to meet their statutory duties, but this comes at the expense of non-statutory homelessness, which can include the majority of people sleeping on our streets, and services focused on preventing homelessness. Providers have done all they can to balance the books and are running out of things to cut without undermining the safety of their services. Meanwhile, rising homelessness places increased strain on health and emergency services.

As providers of services from across the country, we firmly believe that a more effective and efficient homelessness system is possible, one that regains strategic control over homelessness spending by reinvesting in a holistic system, rooted in effective partnerships, that works for all. The new Government has committed to a cross-government strategy to get us back on track to ending homelessness, this needs to be backed by a cross-government funding approach. It should be an urgent priority of the Treasury to launch a systematic, cross departmental review of all homelessness-related spending informing a commitment to develop and deliver a consolidated, ring-fenced homelessness funding system from 2026/27 onwards.

In your speech at Labour Party Conference, you said “it is time that the Treasury moved on from just counting the costs of investments, to recognising the benefits too.” The cost of homelessness is felt across our society, holding people back from achieving their potential and placing huge strain on wider public services. Putting in place the foundations for a stable and effective homelessness sector should, therefore, be seen as an investment and a key steppingstone for Labour’s mission driven Government, with the upcoming Autumn Budget an opportunity to show that the Government is serious about getting back on track to ending homelessness.

Yours sincerely
